

Mennie's Speedwell Bar

Dundee, as a thriving industrial city, had many attractive Victorian and Edwardian commercial premises in the form of shops, offices, clubs and public houses, etc. carefully designed and executed by skilled craftsmen. Over the decades the majority of these have been lost, with changing ownerships and uses, deterioration and the commercial requirement for repeated modernisation programmes with the introduction of new materials and design styles.

The Speedwell Bar, on the main thoroughfare of the prosperous West End, is one Edwardian public house that has retained its original shopfront and fittings, perhaps due to their original exceptional craftsmanship.

In fact it is one of very few pubs in Scotland, and the only one in Dundee so far, which has been listed for the quality of its interior, and one of the few surviving pubs mentioned in the definitive 1983 book "People's Palaces, Victorian and Edwardian Pubs of Scotland". The Speedwell was built in 1903 for James Speed (hence its name) and designed by the architects John Bruce and Son.

As with many of the older Perth Road shops, the frontage is a lesson in good shopfront design. The traditional dark green, black and white colour scheme is dignified, and compliments the very attractive Art Nouveau etched plate glass windows and lettering to the boards screening the seat backs inside.

The main public bar is entered through the mahogany and etched glass inner screen, with additional separate doors to the front part of the L-plan bar, to the side of the main bar are two small lounges, front and back, with a glazed screen between, now sensibly designated smoking and non smoking.

All the fitments are beautifully crafted of mahogany: bar, gantry, doors, drinks shelves, dado panelling and fireplaces. The bar is divided by glazed screens with urn finials, to allow customers chatting at the bar a little privacy from their neighbours. The internal doors and screens are all glazed with etched glass to the same design as the front windows. Even the toilets retain original Shanks fitments, crazed white tiled walls and mosaic floors.

It is encouraging that this genuine Edwardian pub interior, unlike so many stylised reproduction interiors, has not suffered the indignity of having its original cluttered by "period" nicknacks and functions as a modern pub with the necessary equipment of today.
